- she is unwell
- they think CPR "wouldn't work"
- they think it's "not in her best interests"

If she has capacity, her wishes override all of that.

What you can safely say to the hospital

You can say this calmly and clearly:

"My mother is awake, able to communicate, and has clearly stated she does not want a DNR. Under NHS policy and the Mental Capacity Act, her wishes must be respected if she has capacity. I am requesting an immediate review of the DNR decision and confirmation that her refusal has been recorded."

This is safe, factual, and within your rights.

If you want, I can write:

- a short statement you can read to the nurse in charge
- a formal request for the consultant
- a PALS message ↓
- a written note to put in her file

Key Point: If a patient has capacity and says "I do not want a DNR," the hospital must respect that.

Across the NHS, the general rule is:

If a patient is awake, able to understand, able to communicate, and says they do NOT want a DNR, then a DNR should not be in place.

A DNR cannot override a patient's own expressed wishes if they have capacity.

Capacity means the person can:

- understand the information
- retain it long enough to decide
- weigh it up
- communicate their decision

If she can do those things, then her decision is the one that counts.

What NHS policy generally requires in this situation

If a patient has capacity and says:

"I do not want a DNR."
